NASHVILLE -- Tennessee Department of Labor & Workforce Development Commissioner Michael E. Magill today announced the appointment of Martin Toth as the new Chief Boiler Inspector for the agency. Toth has served as a boiler inspector for the State for the past eight years.

“I am pleased that Martin has accepted the position as Chief Boiler Inspector,” Magill said. “Our Department inspects 63,000 boilers and pressure vessels each year. I am confident in Martin’s ability to lead this section, given both his experience and extensive knowledge of boilers and pressure vessels.”

The Department of Labor & Workforce Development protects the general public, owners and users, and their employers from the potential hazards inherent to the operation of boilers and pressure vessels.

A native of Erin, Toth has received his A, B, and N certifications and is National Board and ASME-Certified as a Quality Control Review Team Leader.

“I am very excited about this new opportunity,” Toth said. “We continue to improve the way we inspect boilers across the state. Tennessee’s boiler inspectors implemented the first electronic inspection report program in the country and I look forward to working to find new ways to inspect the state’s boilers and pressure vessels in a more efficient and effective manner.”

Prior to coming to the State of Tennessee, Martin was a Machinist Mate in the United States Navy. He currently resides in Nashville.
